

William Morehead <wilmore@pdx.edu>

Outline and Lit review

2 messages

William Morehead <wilmore@pdx.edu>
To: Eric Rodriguez <emr7@pdx.edu>

Tue, Nov 5, 2024 at 12:11 PM

Is a research paper essentially a summation of the conversations I have "listened in on" (by reading the different sources) specifically which ones lead up to my thesis. Which is what I have to say about what has already been said?

[[[Then I would have two-years to practice this in the Honors College and the perk being I get to weigh in on the conversation 2 years early in the form of an undergraduate thesis submitted for peer review and maybe published.]]]

Then submitting a potential publication for peer review is me defending what I want to say before I actually say it. (grace). Then publication is when I get to say a novel idea or supposition to the others in the conversation currently? Which I imagine is the concluding portion of a typical graduate program. Then a dissertation is when I have a lot to say or something very important to contribute so it gets subjected to double the scrutiny(no grace) and the expectation is as high as it gets for quality and significance?

Is there an actual class on this process top to bottom?

--

The 'future' was only ever going to 'be' what the 'past' decided that it already was ~Time

Eric Rodriguez <emr7@pdx.edu>
To: William Morehead <wilmore@pdx.edu>

Wed, Nov 6, 2024 at 11:19 AM

It's just one part of the process. Granted, according to the schedule, you're further ahead. You would take HON 407 to work through those issues for thesis proposal submission, but that's later on.

--

Eric Manuel Rodriguez, Ph.D.

Assistant Professor
University Honors College
Portland State University
emr7@pdx.edu
He/Him/His

[Quoted text hidden]